RE: Carnegie Library and Freedom's Frontier National Heritage Area

Dear Manager Corliss:

The forty-one counties along the Kansas-Missouri border are poised to become a significant federal heritage area. Freedom's Frontier National Heritage Area was established by the U.S. Congress in October of 2006. The management plan will be completed and presented for approval to the National Park Service and the Secretary of the Interior in the Fall of 2009. This heritage area will connect and tell the powerful stories of the nation-changing events that occurred in this region immediately before the beginning of the Civil War. Those stories related to the question of slavery, ownership of land, right to vote, and myriad other issues that played out along "Freedom's Frontier" – stories that are important and instructive as this nation and other nations consider the meaning of freedom in a modern context.

Freedom's Frontier National Heritage Area was founded in Lawrence and Douglas County. This community will be one of the hub gateways to this important cultural, historic, economic, and educational resource. The time has come to identify a place where people can gather from around the region, the nation, and the world to consider these important old stories and to try to understand how they inform our future. The Carnegie Library Building in Lawrence would be the ideal location to draw people in to begin their journey along "Freedom's Frontier."

Many studies suggest that in difficult economic times, and in the uncertainty of international affairs, visitors are attracted to regional sites that offer educational and experiential opportunities to explore historic, intellectual, and cultural narratives. All indications are that the residents of this region and cultural learners from around the country will be drawn to this heritage area in part to understand their own histories and in part to explore the many perspectives on the definition of freedom in that turbulent time before the Civil War and continuing into the world that we now know.

The trails and rivers that converged in this region were the early transportation routes. Freedom's Frontier National Heritage Area will provide an opportunity to experience those old transportation routes using our contemporary transportation routes to come to the places where these stories resulted in the war that could have spelled the demise of this nation. Instead, from the cauldron of the battles and skirmishes in this region arose a very diverse, independent, and adventurous people who then went on to settle the west according to many of the principles that were established during that pre-Civil War and Civil War period. Lawrence was, in many ways, the epicenter of those turbulent times

It is only fitting that Lawrence should house one of the most important centers from which visitors will experience Freedom's Frontier. The old Carnegie Library, with its important downtown location at the intersection of two main streets, provides an ideal opportunity for Lawrence to quickly propel the development of Freedom's Frontier National Heritage Area. A renovated Carnegie Library could provide a focal point that would make an enormous difference in establishing the importance of this new heritage area. How appropriate it would be that the building that once nurtured the young Langston Hughes in his love of literature would become the gathering place for Freedom's Frontier-nurturing future generations in their quest for understanding the many dimensions of freedom. The building would be an incubator for an ongoing dialogue on freedom – past, present and future. Visitors would come to learn, to experience, to engage, and to go out to explore on contemporary trails, highways, bicycle paths, and virtual tours the sites in Kansas and Missouri that led to the nation that we now know.

In this demanding financial time, it would be a resounding statement to the people of this nation that we will invest in looking back and learning from our past to build a more enlightened future. We can begin by establishing the Carnegie Library as the "take off" point for an adventure on Freedom's Frontier. I am so hopeful that those who are involved in maximizing the use of valuable stimulus funds might see that this is an opportunity to make an enormous difference in understanding our future by relating to the stories of our past. I would be glad to provide any further information if that would be helpful.

Yours very truly,

Deanell Reece Tacha
